Doctor's Desk: Sugar, Fat, and Happiness It's sugar. You've read and repeated it a thousand times in the blogosphere and in print. Yet somehow, I was surprised when this week's doctor's appointment disclosed that I am insulin resistant. It's a good thing I was (way too) candid about the diet I've been on. I am most fascinated to learn how my medications are working so well. My clinician did a full run-down on my pharmacokinetic profile, that is, how long I am able to stay on a drug before I taper, how long it takes to taper, and how long before I rebound. I think the clinician was surprised to find that I have been on long-acting insulin, which likely helped my body to overcome the insulin resistance. This is a good thing because it means more control over my levels. This plus better food choices has helped me to lose weight, my A1C has gone down significantly, and I am on to my second month of being free of diabetes symptoms. Can this be a coincidence? Do I have the good kind of luck that allows me to finally beat this disease? I've been good for months and the results show? Maybe. Or, maybe we all have the same luck that allows us to see the good side of things. We know better. We know this is not luck. It is the result of professional care, education and concerted effort. We know that effort matters. We know that food choices matter. We
