Develops Its Own Dynamic AGG Technology The article you are reading originally appeared in PC Player issue 266 dated April 22, 2005. Greetings folks, I get the oddest questions. So many people who want to know why we created the Dynamic AGG (anti-aliased graphics engine) technology and why, in Heaven's name, did we decide to plumb the depths of madness and slander the basement dwellers of Doom? Thanks to my lovely wife, we actually had to reenact our first FPS game and let people watch us do it. About a dozen of them are currently enjoying this movie... a nice little distraction while we rewrite Windows 2000 :). The short answer? Well, it's been a good one, if I do say so myself. We learned a lot about the technology, the software engine and the people who develop it. We wanted to make a sequel to our first FPS (here comes the name: King Troopers), but could only do it using the Dynamic AGG technology. Maybe sooner than you think, we'll get back to it. Meanwhile, let's talk a little about the technology. So what exactly is Dynamic AGG? If you watched our demonstration above, you'll know. We use a technique called anti-aliasing to smooth jagged edges and thus make sprites smoother. Obviously we hoped it would prove to be sufficient to replace the crude smoothing occurring before ;). To our surprise, they are actually worse in spite of the anti-aliasing. We do use the curved triangles to smooth out the jagged edges where they occur. But it doesn't work as well as it should. It's a technique we now use in some of our games, though it was needed only to make our very first FPS look better. Now, we're not really sure why this technology doesn't really do the job of dynamic anti-aliasing and why it's needed to make sprites look a little smoother. Sort of "floating point rounding". Nothing more. From a business point of view it is, of course, certainly convenient to have created a technique that maintains as much as possible the A & B option once and as makes sure you don't lose the appeal. We simply had the idea of using another approach. So we created a technology that does roughly the same. It also has one major disadvantage. You see... we'd like to create anti-aliasing simply for marketing purposes, not performance. While the CurveFX technique reduces
