Windows 8 is available in two editions: Home, Business, and Enterprise. The purpose of this article is to describe the Enterprise Edition of Windows 8; however, it is a good idea to brush up on the general knowledge of this product, since it is the big bang of Windows for consumers and businesses, where prior operating systems were confusingly covered with Windows CE, Windows XP Home and Windows Vista Home. In some instances, you may be able to use Windows 8 as a consumer, but it is designed for large enterprises that utilize a variety of systems and devices. The only way to use the Enterprise Edition of Windows 8 is as a System Administrator for a business, academic institution, government agency, organization or even a home system. I bought this to use it as the server administrator for a small business that owns two websites. It has worked very well, so far. I didn't install the Windows 8 Activation Service -- this is assumed as a default. I installed Windows Firewall to help protect against random people trying to access the various programs installed on the server. The server is running the web server which serves the two websites, so I put Firewall on the server for a reason other than security. I also ran Software Restriction Policies to limit the programs that can be run on the server. The server is also used for email, so I installed both Exchange Server and Office 365 client on the server. So far, so good. Now, let's take a look at the Windows 8 differences between the two editions and what the improvements are for the enterprise. For Windows 8.1 (and Windows 8): [nt ntNote: Not all of the features for Windows 8.1 are currently available. To get the features that are available to you, you must purchase Windows 8.1. In addition, the Windows Store may not have all the apps or games that are available for download. Please see the Windows Store Terms of Use and Limitations for more information.
